

Humankind: News Made Apocalypse

A lot of people believe that everything in the world is going bad. There is pollution, a pandemic, people starving, global warming, tons of violence, and several other problems. Most people also get this info from the news. The reality is that things are getting better. There have been pandemics much worse than this one. Pollution is going down and companies are working to stop global warming. There are also organizations working to feed people and violence has gone down significantly.

People may think that things are just bad right now but I like to believe that they are wrong. There is a lot of good stuff happening, people are getting jobs, places are paying more, crime rates seem to be down, and there are people working hard to help the environment. The reason that people seem to think this is because the news likes to choose more dramatic stories and make them even more dramatic. These are the kind of stories that get the most attention and because of this people tend to think more about all of the bad stuff happening.

People thinking about all the bad stuff happening is not exactly bad since it brings new ideas and ways for people to make things better. People read about how bad something is then want to work to make things better. Eventually someone does the work and organizations are made to make things better. Because of this things really are getting better, even if it does not seem like it on the news. Even around the world, poverty is going down and people are getting fed. So, even though reading the news makes people upset about all of the bad stuff that is happening it is important to remember all of the good stuff that is happening and to do a little something every once in a while to make the world even just a slightly better place.

So, despite the news making it sound like the end of the world, things are getting better. People are being called to action and working to make the world a better place and working hard to help those in need.
