

Questions With No Right Answers

What is the story of our world, both as a whole and as individuals? The way we perceive the world changes what we think about it and about each other. Could we create a good world and if so what would it even look like? We all have different opinions on that so someone's good world may not be a good world for others. What if we already had a good world and lost it, would we even be able to get it back? What were humans like thousands of years ago or even tens of thousands of years ago?

The story of our world changes are perspectives, depending on the story we can see others as enemies or friends. Amongst the hunters, gathers, foragers things seem to be simpler and while we may think that things look bad compared to modern society they actually seemed to be more content. As time passed we developed better technology, faster ways to get larger amounts of food, we have a larger population and so on; but the trade off seems to be that a lot of us are not as happy. We suffer more mentally with higher anxiety and we isolate ourselves and each other a lot more.

Notes to self: Try to come up with answers to these; how does the world work, how are we all interrelated, why are "we" so rich and "they" so poor, why do we think about us versus them, who do the rich keep getting rich or will the rich keep getting richer, will my generation be as well off as the previous generation or will my generation be worse off, is the world getting better or is it getting worse, are the systems in place working for use or against us, is the world fair, are our systems fair, are our systems necessary, is some form of state control necessary and inevitable, is inequality a natural and inevitable byproduct of progress, do poor people deserve what they get, do rich people deserve what they get, how can we get the most good to the most people, how do we insure freedom and liberty while instituting some kind of plan for the better, should we bother on planning or is it a dead end, how do we fit into the world.